Topic: Homeopathic Vs. Allopathic Medicine

Due to the advancement in the medical field, there are many options now available to treat patients. Doctors and practitioners are often using allopathic methods of treatment or homeopathic methods of treatment. Both have their own benefits but have polar differences in the type of properties they have and the ailments for which they are used. There has been a long debate on which method is better and what the actual differences are. And because of the Covid-19 pandemic, their effectiveness is under scrutiny.

What is Allopathy?

Allopathic medicine describes the modern medicine that we see every day around us. Big pharmaceutical companies are all into making drugs that are classified under allopathy medicine. So what exactly is allopathy? In modern medicine, practitioners are treating a virus, symptom, or disease by administering something in the body that is the exact opposite of the bacteria causing the illness.

Examples of allopathy treatment are; that if a patient is suffering from a headache, they are given painkillers like Panadol. If a patient is suffering from constipation, they are given laxatives.

What are the other names used for allopathic medication?

- Biomedicine
- Conventional Medicine
- Mainstream Medicine
- Western Medicine
- Orthodox Medicine

What are the common treatments in allopathic medication?

All modern treatments that are being administered in hospitals and clinics these days are all allopathic medicines. The treatments include the following:

- ✓ Antibiotics (Augmentin, vancomycin, penicillin, amoxicillin)
- ✓ Pain relievers
- ✓ Migraine medicine (ergotamine, triptans)
- ✓ Blood pressure medication (beta-blockers, calcium channel blockers)

- ✓ Chemotherapy
- ✓ Diabetes drugs (metformin, thiazolidinediones)

There are other surgical treatments or procedures that are also classified under allopathic medicine, such as

- ✓ Surgery
- ✓ Radiations
- ✓ Other therapies and procedure

What is homeopathy?

In homeopathy, the concept relies on that the place or source that caused the disease will also cure it. This means that it is in total contrast with allopathy. It also believes that a lower dose over the course of time can have amazing healing effects as opposed to an allopathic one which is at times given in high doses for a short time. The medical system was developed in Germany more than two centuries ago.

The homeopathic products are all-natural, meaning big pharmaceutical companies do not produce them. They are plant-based such as arnica, poison ivy, Bella, minerals, or animals, such as crushed whole beans. However, these treatments are not very common and are being studied extensively worldwide. Some doctors advise against going for hemopathy as they yield no results; however, the treatment has shown great results to some.

What forms do homeopathy medicines administer?

- ✓ Just like allopathic medicines, homeopathy is administered in the following ways.
- ✓ Ointments
- ✓ Capsules
- ✓ Sugar like substances
- ✓ Gels
- ✓ Drops
- ✓ Tablets
- ✓ Creams

It is very common that if two people have the same ailment, they will be given different types of treatments because homeopathy is individualized for everyone. Meaning they are specifically made for patients by examining their overall health. The treatment uses a different diagnostic system that decides which patient receives what kind of treatment and recognizes symptoms and signs over time, which are quite different from conventional medical treatments.

The Contrast

What are the differences between Allopathy and Homeopathy treatments?

There are some major differences between allopathic and homeopathic treatment that can help you decide which treatments are good for you.

Allopathic Medicine: The treatment's primary goal is to eliminate the diseases and cure the patient. One of the most evident allopathic medicine treatments is the covid-19 vaccines, which are designed to combat the virus in the body by administering bacteria that could kill the virus. Furthermore, there are antibiotics designed to heal your body if you have an infection in the body.

Allopathic medicines are always going through extensive research and development. There will never be a time when you won't see better treatments coming in the medical field. They are also constantly being tested, so it is more evidence-based medication.

Homeopathic Medicine: Homeopathic Medicine aims to strengthen the immune system by giving the small patient doses of medicine over the course of time. That is why the course can be different for each individual who is under treatment. There are no known or visible side effects of the medicine; however, more research is still underway.

The core differences between the two

- ✓ The primary difference between homeopathy and allopathy is that homeopathy is an ancient way to cure patients; however, allopathy is a modern way to cure patients.
- ✓ Doctors that are licensed to pursue allopathy are not legally allowed to give homeopathy medicines to their patients.
- ✓ Allopathic medicines are designed to cure the infection in your body, whether in part of your organ, but homeopathy is designed to cure the entire body.

- ✓ Many people are suffering from severe diseases around the world, such as skin diseases such as psoriasis, cracked skin, or migraines are likely to go towards homeopathic medicines.
- ✓ Many people do not like to ingest medicines; hence homeopathic medicines are a great substitute for curing these ailments as well as some of the temporary conditions like sprains, joint injuries, spasms, strains.
- ✓ Patients who have more serious diseases such as cancer, Parkinson's disease, hypertension, diabetes, rheumatoid arthritis will be given allopathic medicines under rigorous research and testing and have shown promising results to manage or cure the symptoms.

Conclusion

Whether a patient is looking for treatment for a loved one or for themselves largely depends on the type of ailment the patient is suffering from. Some people do not like to eat hard medicines that either don't taste good or are hard to swallow; it is perfect to start homeopathic medicine as they come in many different forms. Most patients prefer allopathy over homeopathy because it is extensively researched and widely tested. Pharmaceutical companies invest a lot to ensure that all their drugs comply with all safety regulations; however, that does not mean that patients would not suffer from any side effects. Everybody is different and can respond differently to medical treatments.
